

EFNI 2026 DRAFT PROGRAM

EFNI - where ideas become policy

How can we operate effectively and ethically in a world that is changing faster than we can keep up with? Participants at the 15th anniversary edition of the European Forum for New Ideas will be seeking answers to this question. Discussions on the future will begin with a reflection on the values shaping contemporary societies. The Forum will conclude with a speech by Prime Minister Donald Tusk. The event, organised by the Lewiatan Confederation, will take place on 14-16 October 2026 in Sopot.

Today, we know enough to be able to make sense of the emerging reality. Wars, the shifting balance of power between major powers, the energy transition and the development of artificial intelligence are redefining the conditions under which businesses operate and societies function. This year's EFNI will provide a forum for discussing how to build resilience, competitiveness and long-term strategies in a world of constant change.

The event will be organised around four new thematic tracks: Our New World, Our New Europe, Our New Poland and Our New Human.

In debates on the economy, technology, security and social change, participants will not focus solely on identifying problems. The aim of this anniversary edition is, above all, to seek solutions that can translate into concrete actions by businesses, public administration and European institutions.

The starting point for this year's discussions will be a presentation of the results of the World Values Survey – regarded as one of the most important international projects examining changes in values and social attitudes. For almost five decades, this survey has made it possible to track global processes of social, cultural and civilisational change, covering most of the world's countries and around 90 per cent of its population. In the session devoted to the World Values Survey, chaired by Prof. Radosław Markowski, Prof. Christian Welzel, co-creator of the 'Inglehart-Welzel Cultural Map of the World' – widely recognised in the global social sciences – will present the global and European perspectives of the last half-century. Key findings for Poland will be discussed by Prof. Agnieszka Turska-Kawa, a member of the team analysing the WVS results.

Prof. Jerzy Hausner and Cardinal Grzegorz Ryś will then reflect on the condition of modern man, presenting the main ideas of Pope Leo XIV's encyclical Magnifica Humanitas. The opening of EFNI will culminate in a debate on 'Values and the Meaning of Life' featuring Dr Katarzyna Kasi, Prof. Karolina Wigura, Prof. Magdalena Środa, Prof. Andrzej Leder and Prof. Michał Rusinek

For 15 years, EFNI has served as a platform for dialogue between representatives of business, academia, culture and public administration. It is a place where ideas are transformed into concrete recommendations and proposals for action relating to the economy and public policy.

The forum brings together different communities to discuss the future of Poland, Europe and the world.

A Multipolar World in Practice: Europe's Strategy Between the U.S., China, and Russia

In a world increasingly shifting toward a multipolar order, Europe faces the need to define its own strategy among the major powers that are reshaping the global framework of security, the economy, and influence. Relations with the U.S. are being tested by Washington's new approach to its global role and its partners in Europe, which, in light of recent discussions about the realignment of the alliance's strategic interests and potential tensions in the Arctic, takes on new significance for transatlantic security. At the same time, China is intensifying its economic influence, and Russia is leveraging its cooperation with Beijing and multilateral tools to challenge Western orders. Participants in the debate will consider how Europe can develop an autonomous, balanced strategy in this complex landscape: from cooperation with partners, through the management of geopolitical risks, to building economic resilience and security in the face of rivalry between Washington, Beijing, and Moscow.

- Marcin Bosacki, secretary of state, Ministry of Foreign Affairs
- Prof. Bogdan Góralczyk, European Centre, University of Warsaw
- Marek Magierowski, former Polish ambassador to the U.S. and Israel
- Patrycja Sasnal, senior professorial fellow, European Neighborhood Chair, College of Europe, Natolin

The Aspirations of the Younger Generation. How Do We Plan Our Future?

Generation Z is entering adulthood amid profound social, economic, and technological changes. Its aspirations extend beyond the job market to include quality of life, family, education, security, the role of the state, new technologies, and Poland's place in Europe and the world. At the same time, entrepreneurs recognize that the values and expectations of the younger generation will shape the future of the economy, the labor market, and social development. The starting point for the debate will be the results of a nationwide survey on the aspirations of the younger generation and entrepreneurs' perspectives on Poland's most important development challenges through 2035. Comparing these two perspectives will help identify areas of agreement, as well as those requiring greater dialogue and cooperation. The discussion will cover career, educational, and family plans; visions of the labor market, entrepreneurship, and future skills; expectations regarding the government and social services; as well as the role of investment, innovation, and new technologies. Participants will also discuss Poland's place in the EU and the changing international order, as well as the choices that will shape Poland's future over the next decade.

Sports as a tool for promoting the country, business, and values

Sports have become one of the most effective tools for building the image of countries, brands, and local communities. Major sporting events attract global attention, strengthen a country's reputation, and generate tangible economic benefits. Thanks to their charisma and global reach, athletes can effectively convey the values of a country and a business to the public, while companies, through collaboration with them, can build trust and emotional bonds with their audience. Their involvement in campaigns or social initiatives expands the reach of the message and builds lasting emotional relationships with audiences. At the same time, sports influence social attitudes, promote health, equal opportunities, integration, and responsibility. During the panel, we will discuss how to strategically leverage sports to promote the state and business, where the line between authenticity and marketing lies, and how investments in sports can strengthen social capital and support long-term development.

Renewable Energy as the foundation of the energy transition: opportunities and risks for Europe and Poland

The energy transition based on renewable energy sources has become one of the most important elements of the development strategies of both the European Union and Poland.

In 2024, renewable energy accounted for an increasing share of the EU's electricity mix—solar farms generated more energy than coal-fired power plants, and the share of wind and solar in the EU's electricity reached approximately 29%. In Poland, the share of RES in electricity production rose to a record high of approximately 29% in 2024, mainly due to the expansion of wind and solar installations, although coal still dominates the energy mix. The panel will examine the social and economic dimensions of this change: the benefits of diversifying energy sources, improving air quality, creating new jobs, and reducing dependence on fossil fuels; as well as the challenges facing the system—from grid modernization and public acceptance of local investments to the need for workforce training and adaptation. The debate will demonstrate how the green transition can serve as a catalyst for sustainable development, rather than merely a cost challenge.

Citizens' Health as Europe's Capital: Challenges and Strategies for Resilience

The health of societies is increasingly becoming one of Europe's key development resources—a prerequisite for economic competitiveness, social cohesion, and demographic stability. The debate will focus on the challenges facing European health care systems: an aging population, growing mental health issues, increasing inequalities in access to care, and financial pressure on public systems. The discussion will draw on European strategies and initiatives aimed at building resilience—the development of preventive care, investments in medical innovation and digitalization, strengthening citizens' health literacy, and better coordination of policies at the EU level. The discussion will focus on how to view health not as a cost, but as a long-term investment in Europe's future.

Digital Europe. Do we still have our own strategy for technological sovereignty?

Europe is facing a transformative digital revolution that is redefining the continent's economies, politics, and security. The question of its own strategy for technological sovereignty has become crucial: Can the EU innovate and regulate simultaneously while maintaining its independence from tech giants in the U.S. and China? The debate will address the challenges and opportunities of digital transformation, the role of member states in building their own platforms and technologies, the importance of investing in skills, and the strategies that will allow Europe to maintain its influence in the global technology race. It is a discussion about whether Europe today has a vision and the capacity to act in the digital world.

From history to entrepreneurship. How can we teach young people to be proactive?

Poland's economic transformation has unleashed a tremendous energy of entrepreneurship and individual initiative. Today's twenty-somethings are growing up in a country that is incomparably wealthier, more open and offering far more opportunities than Poland in the early 1990s. Paradoxically, however, this does not translate into a high level of entrepreneurial activity among the younger generation. Where does this gap between opportunities and the willingness to act come from? Can entrepreneurship be taught? And what exactly should we be teaching young people: economics, risk-taking, responsibility, independence – or, above all, a sense of agency?

Transparency vs. Distrust: How Can the Polish Government and the Business Community Communicate Effectively?

A strong and competitive economy requires a partnership between the public sector and the business community, based on mutual trust, transparency, and predictable rules. In practice, dialogue between the two sides is often hampered by communication barriers, cumbersome procedures, unclear regulations, and differing perspectives and goals. How can we build relationships that foster joint efforts to address economic challenges? How can we increase the transparency of decision-making processes and create sustainable mechanisms for dialogue

A new architecture of growth: Where can we find competitive advantages in a changing world?

In the face of global tensions, rising business costs, and the energy and technological transitions, Poland and Europe are faced with the need to redefine the sources of economic growth. Competitiveness today requires more than just cheap labor or scale of production—innovation, productivity, modern infrastructure, access to talent, and an efficient government creating a predictable regulatory environment are becoming key. The panel will focus on how to build new competitive advantages in a world prone to shocks and rapid change. Capital for security: how to finance European defense in the new reality

Europe is entering a period of redefining its approach to security—both strategically and economically. Growing geopolitical tensions and the war in Ukraine are forcing a significant increase in defense spending, the scale of which exceeds the capacity of national budgets alone. This raises new questions about the role of the financial sector in building security. What instruments can mobilize private capital? Should defense become a fully-fledged investment sector? How can ESG policies be reconciled with defense sector financing? The panel will focus on new models of security financing and the role of banks, funds, and public institutions in building a resilient and secure Europe.

The Packaging Market Under the Microscope: Will Nationalization of the Sector Solve the Waste Problem?

The draft law on packaging and packaging waste is one of the most important—but also one of the most controversial—environmental reforms of recent years. Businesses do not dispute the need to implement an effective packaging return system or the “polluter pays” principle. The dispute centers on how the system should operate and its compliance with EU law. The draft bill calls for far-reaching nationalization of the system, transferring management of funds to a single public entity, and the dissolution of packaging recovery organizations. To date, no analyses have been presented confirming that such a nationalized model will be more effective than the solutions in most EU countries and will result in higher levels of separate collection and recycling. During the legislative process, concerns regarding the draft's impact on competition were raised not only by business organizations but also by certain government ministries. Will a state monopoly actually improve the system's efficiency, or will it instead increase costs that consumers will ultimately bear? During the debate, representatives from government, business, and experts will discuss how to create a system that complies with EU law, is environmentally effective, and at the same time supports the economy's competitiveness.

A strategy for Polish industry

Europe finds itself at a geopolitical crossroads. On the one hand, it is competing with Asian economic powers, and on the other, it is facing growing assertiveness from the United States.

Furthermore, European industry is grappling with high energy prices, which are undermining its competitiveness. Poland is not an isolated economic island. Our industrial heritage is also at risk if no action is taken to preserve it and support its development. Polish Added Value: Local Content in Strategic Projects

Large-scale infrastructure investments are increasingly viewed not only as transportation or logistics projects, but also as tools for building a country's long-term economic advantage. Strategic projects implemented in Poland can serve not only as a catalyst for infrastructure development, but also as an opportunity to strengthen domestic capabilities, develop innovative technologies, and build a strong support base for Polish companies. A key challenge today is answering the question of how strategic investments can increase the participation of Polish companies in supply chains, support the development of local industry, and create sustainable added value for the economy. In this context, the concept of "local content" takes on new significance—as an element of development policy that supports innovation, jobs, and the country's competitiveness. During the debate, we will also discuss best practices from Poland and abroad, as well as regulatory barriers that may hinder the effective implementation of mechanisms supporting the country's economic potential.

The single market in practice: how to unleash the potential of European SMEs

The single market is one of the greatest strengths of the European economy, yet for many small and medium-sized enterprises, its potential remains untapped. Regulatory barriers, differences in the implementation of regulations, limited access to financing, and difficulties in scaling up

Health in Motion: How does physical activity strengthen society and the healthcare system?

Physical activity is one of the most effective tools for preventive healthcare—it reduces the risk of chronic diseases, improves mental well-being, and tangibly reduces the workload on healthcare systems. Meanwhile, according to EU research, a significant proportion of Europeans, including Poles, do not get enough exercise, which translates into rising healthcare costs and a decline in quality of life. Europe is investing in programs that support citizens' physical activity, and cities are developing infrastructure that encourages movement: bike paths, recreational spaces, and local sports initiatives. Poland is also making efforts to increase physical activity—from mass sports to promoting a healthy lifestyle in schools. The panel will demonstrate how physical activity can become one of the key pillars of public health and how investing in physical activity benefits society as a whole and the healthcare system.

The sea that connects. How Baltic cooperation can drive Europe's development

The Baltic Sea is becoming one of Europe's most important economic and strategic regions. The region's location, port development, infrastructure investment and growing cooperation between Poland and the Nordic countries are creating new opportunities for trade, industry and security of supply. At a time of growing geopolitical tensions and the restructuring of global supply chains, the Baltic Sea is gaining importance as a key transport and economic route linking Northern and Central Europe with global markets. How can the potential of Polish ports and maritime infrastructure be harnessed? How can we attract investment and build the competitiveness of the Baltic Sea region? What role can cooperation with Scandinavia play in the development of new technologies, energy and the green economy? The debate will explore how the Baltic Sea can become one of the drivers of Europe's growth and a cornerstone of its economic resilience.

Long-Term Investment in the Polish Economy - Barriers and Factors

Long-term investment is a prerequisite for the long-term growth of an economy's productivity. Today, this applies in particular to resources and sectors such as energy, water, rare raw materials, digital technologies, and space technologies. That is why it is so important to identify, on the one hand, the barriers and, on the other, the factors that influence the initiation and completion of long-term, large-scale investment projects. These factors stem from the functioning of the capital market—including the banking system—the economic regulatory framework, and entrepreneurial dynamism.

Nuclear Energy: between safety, sovereignty, and innovation

In the face of growing geopolitical challenges and the energy transition, nuclear energy is once again becoming a key element of strategic debates in Europe. Although in 2023 nuclear power plants in the EU generated over 619,000 GWh of electricity, accounting for approximately 22.8% of total electricity production and ranking it among the most important low-carbon energy sources, this share is declining in the long term due to the decommissioning of old reactors and a lack of major investments in new technologies. The debate on nuclear power is also a question of energy supply security, the resilience of energy systems, sovereignty against external geopolitical influences, and the innovation of future technologies. The development of air transport in Poland - challenges, investments, and the future

The Polish aviation market is currently one of the fastest-growing in Europe - in 2025, the country's airports handled over 66 million passengers. This dynamic growth translates into investment pressure: there are already 15 passenger airports in operation, which are expanding their route networks and infrastructure. At the same time, forecasts indicate that by 2035, traffic could exceed 100 million travelers annually. In this context, the Central Communication Port (CPK) project plays a key role; it is set to become a hub for intercontinental traffic and achieve a capacity of approximately 30-34 million passengers per year in its first phase. Will the CPK strengthen Poland's position in the global network of connections, or will it rather shift the balance of power among regional airports? How can the development of a central hub be reconciled with the growing role of local airports? The panel will attempt to answer these questions and define the future of Polish airspace.

Made in Pomerania: from subcontractor to technology developer. Launch of the Invest in Pomerania report 'Focus on Pomerania: The Defence Sector'

Pomerania is one of Poland's most strategic regions from a defence perspective: two deep-water ports, critical infrastructure, and the Baltic Sea as a NATO border. It is no coincidence that an industry capable of meeting these needs has flourished here – companies with civilian, often maritime, roots, which today design radars, anti-drone systems, communications and unmanned platforms for the military. However, the report raises a question that goes beyond the region. Poland's defence industry is growing faster than ever and stands at a juncture where it can transition from the role of subcontractor and licence holder to that of a developer of its own solutions – a path previously taken by Turkey and South Korea.

The PPWR sets a new course for the packaging market in the European Union. The greatest challenge, however, is no longer the direction of the changes themselves, but the pace of their implementation. Businesses need to learn as soon as possible the details of the regulations that will be specified in numerous delegated and implementing acts. It will be up to them to determine what the new obligations will look like in practice and how much time companies will have to prepare for the changes. The school of tomorrow: what kind of education do Poland and Europe need?

In the face of rapid technological, demographic, and social changes, modern education systems are challenged not only to impart knowledge but also to prepare young people for the future of work and life in a complex world. In the European Union, only about 55% of people aged 16-74 possessed at least basic digital skills, and disparities between countries and social groups remain significant—ranging from 83% in the Netherlands to 28% in Romania. On the other hand, over 44% of the population aged 25-34 in the European Union already holds a higher education degree. The debate will bring together experts, policymakers, and practitioners to reflect on key questions: how can curricula be modernized to develop the competencies of the future? Ten years after the referendum. What Poland can learn from the Brexit experience

Ten years after the 2016 referendum, the United Kingdom has been through the full cycle of leaving the European Union. There were negotiations, new trade borders and changes in labour and capital markets. Today the UK is rebuilding its relationship with the Union, including a return to Erasmus+ from 2027. The effects are clearest on the Irish border, where Brexit affected trade, daily life and the peace process at the same time. The panel brings together three perspectives: political, social and business. We discuss what leaving has changed in practice for citizens, companies and investors. We also ask what it costs to rebuild what membership provided as a matter of course, and how the UK is shaping its partnership with Europe and with Poland today. These experiences are a valuable reference point for the Polish debate on the country's place in the Union. They show the value of the single market, free movement of people and European programmes, and they make it possible to assess that value on the basis of facts.

European Industry Under Pressure: How Can We Maintain Competitiveness and Strengthen Domestic Businesses?

European industry is facing increasing pressure from global competition, particularly from China. This applies to sectors such as household appliances, the automotive industry, cement, and furniture, as well as the entire ecosystem of companies, suppliers, and services that make up Europe's industrial base. Industrial production generates real added value, jobs, and investment, and remains a key source of research, development, and innovation. Is Europe today capable of competing in terms of costs, technology, and scale of production? How can we reduce dependence on imports without weakening the position of European companies in the global market? What conditions should the EU and member states create to strengthen domestic business, investment, and innovation? How can we ensure that manufacturing, skills, and research and development continue to have a future in Europe?

Strength from nature. How to regain balance in a world of constant haste

In a world of constant rush, digital overload, and the pressure to succeed, more and more people are experiencing emotional burnout, loneliness, and difficulty maintaining mental balance. This panel will explore why our brains are overloaded and what methods can help build mental resilience, social connections, and the ability to recharge through contact with nature, movement, experience, and reflection. We'll address the following questions: What methods help us regain agency and mindfulness in our daily lives? Can nature act as an "emotional regulation system"? Do education and personal development have to take place exclusively in classrooms and online? How can we create daily well-being rituals without "escaping from life"?

Innovation Embedded in the Organization: What Really Worked for Polish Market Leaders

Innovation is increasingly less often the result of individual ideas and more often the result of a deliberately designed organizational culture and effective leadership. What sets apart companies that are able to consistently turn innovation into a competitive advantage and sustainable growth? What role does management play in building a system that supports the development of new solutions? Should innovation be the domain of specialized teams, or the responsibility of the entire organization? In times of economic uncertainty and growing pressure for efficiency, the question of funding innovation and assessing its real impact on business results also takes on particular significance. The panel will provide an opportunity to discuss with leaders of Polish companies proven solutions, best practices, and experiences that demonstrate how to effectively build organizations capable of continuous development and the implementation of innovations.

How can we boost the competitiveness of Polish companies in foreign markets?

Ambitions to expand beyond Poland are growing, but so are the barriers. How can Polish companies be made to compete more effectively in global markets and harness their potential for further growth? The discussion will be prompted by the findings of a report prepared by the Citi Handlowy Foundation in collaboration with the Centre for Strategic Thought. The experts invited to the discussion will talk about the key challenges and opportunities associated with the international expansion of Polish companies – from access to capital and new technologies to skills and institutional support. Together, they will consider – or perhaps disagree on – what measures could strengthen the position of Polish business on the international stage. The Citi Handlowy Foundation invites you to attend the session and, beforehand, to take part in a survey, which will be available on LinkedIn and via the EFNI app.

Europe's Strategic Autonomy: Utopia or a Realistic Prospect?

The war in Ukraine, rising geopolitical tensions, strained relations with the U.S., and mounting challenges related to security and competitiveness have led Europe to take the concept of "strategic autonomy" seriously. However, there is no consistent definition of this concept. The prevailing view is that the European Union should "stand on its own two feet" and become independent of external suppliers, at least in strategic sectors ranging from energy to healthcare. But is this even possible in a world of such deep interdependencies? And isn't it too late for this, given the rapid development of other nations, particularly the United States and China? The panelists will attempt to explain how to understand strategic autonomy and how Europe can, in practice, strengthen its position in the world.

Digital Extortion or Image Protection? Ethics, Algorithms, and the Battle for Business Reputation Online.

A company's reputation has become the most fragile currency in today's market. The development of generative artificial intelligence, bot farms, and the automation of online hate have made it possible to launch a massive attack on a company's reputation in a matter of minutes and at minimal cost. However, a true crisis of trust arises at the intersection of technology and the controversial business models of review aggregation platforms. Increasingly, the line between transparency and the phenomenon described by managers as "digital extortion" is blurring. Is a model in which a business owner must pay for a "premium package" or moderation services to control the damaging flood of anonymous, often AI-generated comments still freedom of speech, or has it become a modern mechanism of market pressure? During the panel discussion, business leaders, cybersecurity experts, and lawyers will attempt to define the ethical boundaries in the online platform business. Poland in the Union: models of regional presence in Europe

In the proposal for the 2028-2034 budget, regional programmes move into the national and regional partnership plans, and governments take over responsibility for preparing them. Interreg keeps a plan of its own outside that structure, and the European Committee of the Regions proposes that the regional checks on national plans become binding multilevel governance assessments. For cities and regions this raises one practical question: who represents them where the decisions are made. The panel presents three models that already work. Sopot operates through European networks and city partnerships. Aragón maintains its own representation in Brussels. Tampere works as a consortium of city, university and business in the Baltic Sea region. We discuss what such a presence costs, who pays for it and what it actually delivers, which of these arrangements Polish regions can adopt, and how their position changes once the plan is prepared by the government.

Are Quotas Just a Women's Issue? Men on Leadership and the Responsibility to Drive Change

Poland is among the EU countries with the highest proportion of women in management positions; however, the higher up the corporate ladder, the more this representation declines, particularly on the boards of the largest publicly traded companies. This is precisely the issue addressed by the directive on gender balance in corporate governance, which Poland is implementing with some delay, but whose provisions could significantly change the way we think about appointments and access to top positions. Are quotas a tool for change, or just another regulatory obligation? Why does a mechanism that has proven effective in many EU countries still stir up such strong emotions? And can we talk about balance in corporate governance without discussing the role of men as leaders, board members, and supervisory board members? The panel will discuss what the directive could change in practice: the processes for selecting corporate governance bodies, accountability for nominations, and why gender balance is not solely a women's issue but part of a broader discussion on leadership.
